Ambivalence and Discourse in Alien Nation

William O. Deaver, Jr. ¹

This study examines the 1988 film Alien Nation, detailing the fictitious account of racism and bigotry in the USA toward a group of extraterrestrials. This account is analogous to attitudes toward ethnic minorities. It incorporates theories from Mikhail Bakhtin and Paulo Freire to show how the film upholds negative attitudes toward minorities. The 1988 film Alien Nation depicts the immigrant experience in historical and contemporary America where these groups come to comprise minorities who feel not only the social ostracism of alienation, but also that they form a nation within a nation because of their different linguistic traits, physical appearances, and social customs. Furthermore, the title, in all its ambivalence, emphasizes this rift since the word "alienation" has been split in two; hence, despite affirmative action policies, while assimilation occurs to some degree, social acceptance does not—not in the film, and not in reality. Because of this scission minorities must seek bonding through solidarity within their own ethnic group, forming enclave communities, which upholds a systemic bondage from which they must continually strive to free themselves since the majority denies them positions of true authority as well as the respect that they deserve.
