

Appropriating Liberalism? Regimes of Accumulation and the role of Citizenship

Shane Fudge¹
David Dunkerley²

This article explores the influence of liberal and republican ideas on the concept of citizenship. It is argued that while content and practice has often veered between the two philosophies – and a greater emphasis upon either the individual or society – the article suggests that we can gain a clearer understanding of the more recent history of citizenship by viewing the concept through Ikeda's (2004) regimes of accumulation. In particular, it is argued that the most recent stage of capitalism has appropriated a particular form of liberalism, separating the individual from a collective notion of citizenship that is rooted in society. [Article copies available for a fee from The Transformative Studies Institute. E-mail address: journal@transformativestudies.org Website: <http://www.transformativestudies.org> ©2008 by The Transformative Studies Institute. All rights reserved.]

KEYWORDS: Citizenship, Liberalism, Republicanism, Society, Capitalism, Individualization.

INTRODUCTION

Citizenship is a much used though often ambiguous concept that has

¹ Shane Fudge, BSc, Ph.D., works as a research fellow on the ESRC Project on Lifestyles, Values and the Environment (RESOLVE), at the Centre for Environmental Strategy, University of Surrey. His current research explores the political economy of international energy regimes and national responses to climate change and energy security. He has published on UK political economy, European integration and the relationship between structure, agency and social exclusion. His interests include: social theory, contemporary Marxist thought, and global political economy. Address correspondence to: Shane Fudge, University of Surrey, Guildford, Surrey GU2 7XH, United Kingdom; tel: (0)1483 682187; e-mail: s.fudge@surrey.ac.uk.

² David Dunkerley, BA, MSc, Ph.D., is Professor of Sociology in the Faculty of Humanities and Social Sciences. He teaches undergraduate courses in social inequality, and the sociology of work and economic life. At postgraduate level he co-ordinates the MSc in European societies and supervises MPhil and Ph.D. students. He has recently co-authored two books on European integration and civil society in Wales.